

Passage of Proposal C would cause tuition hike

Passage of Proposal C in November would necessitate a 25 percent tuition increase here Roy Wilbanks, assistant to the president for government and community relations and secretary to the Board of Regents, told a news conference in Detroit Thursday, Oct. 11.

"Passage of Proposal C would mean a net loss of $80 million to higher education this year," Wilbanks said. "At present, EMU's share of the higher education appropriation is six percent, therefore the revenue loss at our institution would be just under $5 million. If we were to maintain our current academic program and services to our 20,000 students, we would have to increase tuition 25 percent or approximately $300 per student."

Wilbanks indicated the financial problems would worsen in 1985-86. "As enrollment declined due to the inability of students to pay the tuition, while state supported scholarship programs also were decreased, faculty and staff layoffs would be inevitable, as would further tuition increases," he said.

Wilbanks noted that EMU has always been committed to ensuring accessibility to higher education for all qualified individuals and has maintained its tuition levels among the lowest of all the state supported colleges and universities. "Passage of Proposal C," he emphasized, "would seriously impair, if not totally void, this commitment."

The Board of Regents unanimously adopted a resolution opposing Proposal C Sept. 26. Wilbanks said the board took this action because it was concerned about the impact Proposal C would have on the system of government in the state and on the "health and vitality of Eastern Michigan University."

"We are (also) concerned," Wilbanks said, "about the impact Proposal C would have on public education at the K-12 level, on the important contribution made by the community colleges, on the other essential state services, on the reformed unemployment compensation system and the effect on the state's business climate and on the way our state may or may not be able to govern itself.

"We are very hopeful that the citizens of the state of Michigan will recognize that while improved economies and efficiencies in state and local government are a highly desirable goal, Proposal C does not provide the best means to achieve those goals," Wilbanks said. "Most state funded services have learned during the past five years to accomplish more with less, and most of us have been doing a good job, taking our responsibility as trustees of the taxpayers' money very seriously. There is always room for improvement," he concluded, "but we emphatically believe Proposal C will not help us in that endeavor."

McEnery investigates sexual harassment

The 1970s cliché "You've come a long way, baby" might be appropriate in describing the social progress women have made since the 1920s, but in the case of sexual harassment and blue-collar women, Dr. Jean McEnery would say "You've got a long way to go."

McEnery, associate professor in the Department of Management, recently completed an article titled "Sexual Harassment in Blue-Collar Jobs — A Problem Unresolved." It was published in the summer 1984 issue of Employment Relations Today and McEnery hopes this article will better inform the general public of a problem that until recently, has been virtually ignored.

McEnery stressed that sexual harassment does not involve consensual sexual behavior, but attention that is unwelcome to the victim. In her article she states there are essentially two types of sexual harassment: sexual coercion which results in direct consequences to the worker's employment status (ie. the supervisor who uses power to demand sexual favors); and sexual annoyance which is defined as hostile, intimidating or offensive behavior. There is no direct link to job benefit or loss.

Before coming to EMU in 1980, McEnery, who holds a doctorate in industrial organizational psychology, worked in managerial positions for several large utility firms. She admits the study she conducted for the article started out as more of a practical interest.

"In one organization where I worked, there was a critical incident that started us looking into the matter of sexual harassment," she said. "One day a woman in a field job simply drove away from work in her truck and ended up in a crisis center. Tracing back we found, or at least she alleged, to have been constantly harassed."

The woman, working in a field job, claimed she had been subjected to repeated harassment from co-workers on the job. Incidents ranged from throwing objects at her, including a dead animal and tools, to blocking her from leaving the job. She even once was abandoned at a deserted site.

McEnery actively participated in the study which the organization immediately launched to see if this was an isolated incident or signs of a significant problem of harassment for women in field jobs.

The study consisted of two focus group sessions, each lasting two hours. The subjects, selected randomly from the blue-collar work line, were all female and of different races. One focus group consisted of six women currently in field jobs and the other group was composed of six women who had had field jobs but requested transfers back to clerical jobs.

The women's views on sexual harassment needed to be assessed without the potential influence of the group process, so the subjects first filled out questionnaires and participated in taped group sessions.

A main fear expressed by most women was that they might have influenced their harassers in one way or another through unconscious flirtation.

"Frankly they (the women) weren't always certain they hadn't asked for it (sexual harassment). Talking to other women, they got a little angrier as the sessions went on, because they began to think, 'No, I didn't do it. It wasn't me. I didn't ask for it.'"

Although the group was limited for the study, the results were alarming. Ninety-two percent of the women polled reported that they had experienced personal incidents of sexual harassment. And, although co-worker harassment was an attributing factor, sexual harassment originating from the supervisor was perceived as much more serious. According to McEnery, supervisors who harass play on women's vulnerability both economically and emotionally. The majority of women avoid complaining to the top-management about incidents because they fear humiliation, not being taken seriously, or worse, finding themselves punished in the form of a refusal for a transfer or promotion.

Unfortunately, even with all the time and effort spent for this study, the organization McEnery worked for refused to believe the outcome. "So I concluded after awhile," McEnery said, "that they weren't interested in stirring up a hornets' nest."

McEnery feels sexual harassment is one of those things in Equal Employment Opportunity that is going to take a very long time to evolve. "We're just beginning to understand and deal with it," she said.

McEnery specializes in career development and studying females in management. She lives in Novi with her husband, John, and two daughters, and is a member of Academy of Management and the Michigan Association of Industrial Organizational Psychologists and Phi Beta Kappa.

McEnery actively participated in the national conference of the Academy of Management in Boston, Mass., last August where she presented "A Case Study of Sexual Harassment."

Food for Thought - Research In Advising

TITLE: DISTRIBUTED STUDIES: Academic Advising in a Cross-Disciplinary Major, AUTHOR: Collen L. Nutty, College of Sciences and Humanities, Iowa State University.

This study assesses the validity and effectiveness of an individualized, cross-disciplinary major for the purposes of employment opportunities and of professional programs of study at the graduate level. A survey was administered using 174 Distributed Studies graduates in which the variables of sex, GPA, date of graduation, areas of concentration, jobs held, salaries, and personal satisfaction with the major were analyzed by computerized statistical procedures. The results reveal that the major is a valid one in terms of employment requisites, credibility for post-graduate work, and personal satisfaction. Finally, recommendations for advising in this non-traditional major are offered.

Ferretti named 'Player of Week'

Mario Ferretti

EMU junior place-kicker Mario Ferretti was named Mid-American Conference "Player of the Week" for the game of Saturday Oct. 6.

Ferretti kicked three field goals in the game against Central Michigan before a record crowd of 21,245 fans in Rynearson Stadium. Ferretti booted field goals of 47, 30 and 35 yards against the Chippewas with the 35-yarder coming with just 0:02 left in the game to enable the Hurons to notch a 16-16 tie with the unbeaten Chips.

A junior college transfer from Muskegon J.C., Ferretti kicked his 47-yard field goal with 8:32 left in the second quarter to put the Hurons on the board. He then added a 30-yard field goal with 13:40 left in the third quarter to make it CMU 13, EMU 6.

The Hurons set up the game-tying field goal by driving from their own 21 yard line to CMU's 18 over the final two minutes of the game. Eastern called a time out with 0:08 left on the clock and facing a fourth down and 13-yard to go situation Ferretti was called upon and responded with his 35-yard game-tying three-pointer.

After missing the first game of the season Ferretti has come on to kick six of seven field goal attempts with his only miss a 57-yard attempt against Bowling Green.

Porter presents University's capital plan

President John W. Porter presented the University's capital plan for the remainder of the decade to the Capital Outlay Committee of the Governor's Commission on the Future of Higher Education Monday, Oct. 8, in Lansing.

The University's strategic plan in the area of capital outlay includes 15 major projects totaling nearly $32 million. The projects include: renovation of Briggs Hall as a student computer laboratory; construction of a new College of Business building; renovation of the Pray-Harold Classroom Building to complete the Arts and Humanities Complex; completion of the renovation of Sill Hall as a College of Technology facility; construction of a new Corporate Training Center; renovation of Ford Hall to accommodate the University's business offices; renovation of Old Alexander Hall as a University Relations building.

Other projects include: renovation of King Hall to expand the space for the College of Health and Human Services; renovation of McKenny Union to provide improved student services; renovation of Sherzer Hall as a science museum; removal of remaining architectural barriers; energy-related capital improvements; campus walkways, roadways and landscaping improvements; and campus master planning.

President Porter noted that Eastern's "capital planning is driven by our academic planning, our desire to provide a safe and attractive campus and our commitment to maintaining our plant which is a combination of beautiful old historic buildings and modern new facilities." The University has established two new colleges during the past 10 years, the College of Health and Human Services in 1974 and the College of Technology in 1980.

Dr. Porter also pointed out that EMU's undergraduate enrollment has increased every year for the last five years, "necessitating the use of every available space for classrooms, offices and housing." In addition, one campus building, Welch Hall, built in 1909, had to be closed in 1982 because of extreme deterioration.

Dr. Porter emphasized that the University has not been waiting for state funding for essential capital projects despite the difficult economic times of recent years. The University financed construction of an $18 million recreation center, which is being paid off through student fees, committed $1.3 million to maintenance and equipment projects during the 1983-84 fiscal year and launched its first-ever capital campaign to renovate the Quirk Dramatic Arts Building and construct the new Sponberg Theater. The campaign will be completed this December.

"Although we have made great progress," Dr. Porter told the committee, "our needs continue to increase daily."
