The first Star Lecture will be held on Tuesday, Sept. 23, 7 – 8:30 p.m. in the Student Center Ballroom. Heather Neff, professor of English and director of the EMU McNair Scholars Program will speak on "To Seek a Better and Truer Self: How concepts of racial identity create, sustain and complicate American culture." "Race" is generally understood as a socially constructed system used to classify individuals according to physical appearance and genealogical descent. In the United States, however, race has historically created social divisions that assign status and levels of privilege to citizens and non-citizens alike. But why does race continue to be a critical marker of individual identity? Why do many find race more important than one's religion, ethnicity or level of wealth? How does American culture profit from convincing us that we're different? Dr. Neff, a specialist in African American Literature who has lived, studied and taught in Europe and the Caribbean will challenge you to question your ideas about your "race" and the "race" of others. To see the complete series, please visit 2014-15 Star Lecture Series.
